spreading his gospel, with the studio reaching the saturation point. In the East the situation isn't quite so rosy, though the industry is beginning to pick up, for with Famous Players hiring Don Marquis of the Sun Diai and Christopher Morley of the Evening Post Bowling Green to act as extras at the preposterous figure of $10 a day, with Marquis and Morley trying to register great emotional virtuosity, it's evident the movie companies are feeling emboldened once more to attempt anything, no matter how daring. Famous has three companies of its own working at the mammoth Long Island studio, while three allied Realart organizations are standing up to the camera in this shop, which can house about eight companies without having any star's natural sweetness of temper jarred by having another star tread on the toes. It was this studio which Famous was forced to close during the winter and have its players confined to the Fifty-sixth street studio, finding that the cost of heating the huge plant for just one company was greater than the rental of the Manhattan hot bed of films.

A fellow official remarked that he understood Bullitt was led to enter the movies by his experience among the peacemakers at Paris, after mingling with whom it would be child's play to preserve concord and amity even in a movie studio. The direct incentive came through a recent partnership with Harrison Rhodes, author and playwright, with whom Bullitt, who has been a newspaper correspondent, concocted a play in forty-eight hours, apparently still being under the pressure of catching the first edition. The play was immediately ly accepted—by Sam H. Harris, according to report—though it has not yet been

At the Fox studios, which can accommediate as many as twenty companies, though ten is the usual number discharging emotions point blank at the lens, one group of players is making the motions of humanity just now, though four have just finished work and four more are expected to come to a state of jell soon. Griffith is busy at his Mamaroneck place, and Constance and Norma Talmadge hardly have time to eneage in shopping sprees. Vitagraph is still moving conservatively, rotating its crops by letting only one of its three main commanders. Though the cinema field is thus coming conservatively, rotating its crops by letting only one of a state of place. The shader shafts of some activation of the state on over a climax at a time.
